Website Measurement and Customization Technologies (e.g. Cookies)

Website measurement and customization technologies (commonly called "cookies") are small bits of text that are downloaded to your internet browser when you visit a website. You can still use Department websites if you do not accept the cookies, but you may be unable to use certain cookie-dependent features.

Session cookies

Session cookies are not stored on your computer's hard drive, and are removed when you complete your session or exit the site. Some websites use these "Tier 1" session cookies to provide streamlined navigation and statistical analysis. These temporary cookies do not gather personally identifying information.

Persistent cookies

Certain websites use "Tier 2" persistent cookies that remain on your computer's hard drive after you complete an activity. For example, some websites use persistent cookies in association with a voluntary customer satisfaction survey conducted by a third party. These surveys obtain feedback and data regarding visitors' satisfaction with our websites, but they do not collect any personally identifying information. If you are randomly selected to participate in this survey, a persistent cookie is stored on your computer's hard drive for 90 days to preclude a new invitation during that time. Some Department websites also use persistent cookies to enable a Google Analytics, Siteimprove, or Webtrends program to measure how new and returning visitors use our websites over time. These persistent cookies do not collect any personally identifying information, and the information collected is used only to improve our websites.
